Information of Interest to CIA that Might be Found in the Nixon Papers

Type of Material

1. CIA provides the White House with intelligence reports and analyses which serve as the basis for making policy decisions on foreign relations and defense related matters. Some are sent on a regular basis at varying intervals from daily to annually, and many respond to requirements generated by world events. This reporting can refer to literally any type of question or any geographical area of the world. In such documents CIA is usually identified in the format sometimes as a member of the Intelligence Community. A potential problem is that information from such documents is sometimes extracted for use in briefing papers or other material without identifying the originating agency. CIA is therefore interested in all information dealing with intelligence matters found in documents of unknown or unclear origin and whether or not it is marked with a classification level.

2. CIA also provides the plans and background that serve as the basis for obtaining decisions and approvals on certain special activities .

3. In unusual circumstances, CIA may be asked to provide support for operational-like activities which could include:
